developing countries are trying to develop long term financial markets and institutional investors are expected to play a key role this paper uses unique evidence on the universe of institutional investors from the leading case of chile to study to what extent mutual funds pension funds and insurance companies hold and bid for long term instruments and which factors affect their choices the paper uses monthly asset level portfolios to show that despite the expectations mutual and pension funds invest mostly in short term assets relative to insurance companies the significant difference across maturity structures is not driven by the supply side of debt or tactical behavior instead it seems to be explained by manager incentives related to short run monitoring and the liability structure that combined with risk factors tilt portfolios toward short term instruments even when long term investing yields higher returns thus the expansion of large institutional investors does not necessarily imply longer term markets

how do you build an investment strategy that has a chance to succeed over the long term to put it another way how do you get there your goal from here your starting point since investing is a risky enterprise it seems obvious that investors should have clear and solidly based expectations of both returns and risks yet few investors have clear expectations and they are often shocked and upset when returns are low or negative so one goal of this book is to outline a systematic method of creating expectations for return and risk over a longer term horizon part of the approach is to study history not just of the us equity market but of global equities currencies fixed income and short term investments knowledge of what has happened in the past is an essential part of understanding what could happen in the future in addition a simple model is developed that describes how returns are structured this model gives deeper insights into historical returns and risks and provides a way of developing explicit expectations for future returns and risks without merely assuming that the future will be the average of the past another goal is to show investors how to develop a sensible long term portfolio strategy the concept of diversification due to imperfect correlations is introduced and combined with an investor's expected long term returns and risks for assets a portfolio can be designed that provides the highest expected return that meets a level of acceptable risk other topics are broached along the way the difficulty of adding value by using active managers the clear positive impact of reducing investment costs and the fact that asset mix determines almost all of a portfolio's return and risk thus for many investors the best long term strategy will use the lowest cost investment vehicles that capture broad market exposures
