abstract the window and the mirror have long served as the dominant metaphors of film theory both being tied to debates concerning film's ability to perfectly replicate the world and fabricate lies this paper charts the evolution of the window and the mirror the window has forever been tied to filmic transparency a style meant to disguise the production of the filmic image where the window has retained this connotation for decades however the treatment of the mirror within film theory has varied widely this paper merges window theory with three distinct mirror theories christian metz's reworking of jacques lacan's mirror stage the mirror as a reflection of culture john szarkowski and reflection theory and the mirror as a multiplier of space metz merging the window's transparent view with these different kinds of reflections this paper posits a new metaphor a window that reflects this metaphor is then applied to two classically made films rear window 1954 dir alfred hitchcock and la notte 1961 dir michelangelo antonioni and one digital video how to fix the world 2004 dir jacqueline goss my point in applying these theories to these films is to show how the newly fashioned metaphor is capable of both summarizing what we already know of film and of conceptualizing the changes wrought in cinema as a result of the proliferation of digital technologies in production processes specifically what i find here is that digital cinema constantly straddles a barrier between two worlds between our world the one that cinema had previously captured and another world defined not by chance or contingency but on the manipulability of the image
