james macqueen 1778 1870 was a british geographer and also one of the most outspoken critics of the methods of the british anti slavery campaign in the 1820s and 1830s although he never visited africa he became an acknowledged expert on the continent through reading all available accounts ancient and modern as well as interviewing slave merchants while managing a sugar plantation in the west indies this work was published in 1840 and was aimed at assisting the expansion of colonial trading interests in the preface he is critical of the efficacy of british attempts to eradicate the slave trade and also of the ill preparedness and often fatal ignorance of many explorers he believed that with better information and planning european involvement in africa could be much more effective and that the slave trade could be better reduced by the work of missionaries and by increased trade than by military intervention
