communication is the key to organisational success and nowhere is this truism more apparent than in the influence of internal communication during a transformational process as dramatic as a merger or acquisition during the complex process of bringing the two sets of employees together continuous effort is crucial for keeping in touch with how people feel communicating information clearly across both bidder and target and beginning the process of creating a new culture for the merged company communication is vital but information on what to do when and how to overcome or at least minimise the practical problems inherent in trying to communicate at a time when there is often little news and when so much must remain confidential is essential employee communication during mergers and acquisitions provides a blueprint for your internal communication during a merger or acquisition it contains checklists examples and tables to help busy communication and integration teams by providing them with practical guidance and examples of what they should consider the authors start with the genesis of your strategy and the statutory framework before the partner company has been identified then move on to each of the stages of negotiation merger announcement pre merger preparation and in the critical first 100 days following the merger the book includes chapters exploring the process of developing the employer brand for the new entity as well as of measuring and building on the success of your strategy and is illustrated throughout by a range of case studies master s thesis from the year 2012 in the subject business economics investment and finance grade 1 0 copenhagen business school course corporate finance language english abstract several studies show that people are often influenced by reference points which are derived from the context at hand in estimations or decisions under uncertainty this analysis deals with the importance of reference points in the uk and to a lesser extent the european takeover market applying prospect theory to equity investment we would predict that shareholders value gains and losses relative to a reference point in a very human fashion in a psychological bias called the anchoring effect investors adopt irrelevant salient anchor values as reference points and are biased towards these we follow these predictions and in this thesis test historic peak prices as anchor values in corporate takeovers for bidder and target management as well as shareholders firstly we analyze whether bid prices are affected by the 13 26 39 52 and 65 week high prices secondly we are interested in whether for companies whose valuation has fallen far from the historic peaks these anchor values are of lesser relevance consistent with the s shaped form of the prospect theory value function finally bidding above the historic peak prices is tested and analyzed in whether this entails a higher probability of bidding success for the purpose of the thesis a dataset of in total 1602 takeover bids for listed companies in the united kingdom 1559 germany 36 and poland 7 from thomson one banker was constructed the sample includes bids announced and completed in the time period of 1985 2011 data on stock price history for the target companies was extracted from thomson reuters datastream ols regression gaussian kernel regression piecewise linear regression and probit regressions are the tools employed to thoroughly analyze the data we find that all historic reference values examined exhibit statistically significant impact on the bidder offer prices with diminishing impact of the reference prices observed for extreme values importantly no statistically significant evidence that bidding above historic peak prices secures a higher acceptance rate from target shareholders was discovered this finding does not support the reference point thinking for target shareholders the same is true for offer price increases offer prices below peak prices do not carry a higher probability of being amended than offer prices ranging above reference prices
