climate change poses questions of intergenerational justice but some of its features make it difficult to determine whether we have obligations of climate justice to future generations this book offers a novel argument justifying the present generation s obligations to future people livia ester luzzatto shows that we have intergenerational obligations because many of our actions are based on presuppositions about future people when agents engage in such intergenerational actions they also acquire an obligation to recognise those future people as agents within their principles of justice and with that a duty to respect their agency and autonomy intergenerational challenges and climate justice also offers a way to circumvent the problems of non identity and non existence its approach overcomes the intergenerational challenges of climate change by meeting three necessary criteria providing ways to cope with uncertainty dealing with the complexity of climate change and including future people for their own sake the author meets these criteria by adopting an action centred methodology that grounds our obligations of justice on the presuppositions of activity this robust framework can be used to justify increased climate action and the greater inclusion of future oriented policies in current decision making this book will be of great interest to academics and students concerned with the issues of climate and intergenerational justice

this book presents a contractualist theory of intergenerational justice that avoids deficiencies in existing igj theories e g the non identity problem and the under defining of generations the inability of social contract theory to provide a thorough accounting of justice between generations has been called an embarrassment and rightly so that said serious attempts have been made from a variety of contract perspectives to rectify the approach s shortcomings in the area of intergenerational justice one of the most prominent contract theorists john rawls attempted to address justice between generations in his theory via his just savings principle but both versions of it were met with stinging criticism as the climate crisis among other challenges presses the issue of justice for future generations the authors believe that intergenerational justice is something that social contract theory should and can address specifically they present a rawlsian approach that begins with a clarified understanding of what is meant by generations and proceeds from there to modify generational knowledge constraints in the original position the authors then draw upon the concept of indirect reciprocity to round out an argument for a rawlsian principle of justice between generations intergenerational fair equality of opportunity they then apply their intergenerational justice theory to five major public policy areas
