letter i from the architect every man should have a home my dear john now that your ship is at last approaching the harbor i am confident your first demonstration in honor of its arrival will be

building yourself a house exchanging your charmingly good for nothing air castle for an actual flesh and blood matter of fact dwelling house two storied and french roofed it may be with all the modern improvements in many respects you will find the real house far less satisfactory and more perplexing than the creation of your fancy air castles have some splendid qualities there are no masons and carpenters contracts to be made no plumbers bills to be vexed over the furnaces never smoke and the water pipes never freeze they need no insurance and you have no vain regrets over mistakes in your plans for you may have alterations and additions whenever you please without making a small pandemonium and eating dust and ashes while they are in process nevertheless i have no doubt you will plunge at once into the mysteries and miseries of building and knowing your inexperience i cannot at such a juncture leave you wholly to your own devices it is a solemn thing to build even the outside of a house you not only influence your fellow men but reveal your own character for houses have a facial expression as marked as that of human beings often strangely like their owners and in most cases far more lasting some destroy your faith in human nature and give you an ague chill when you pass them others look impudently defiant while many make you cry out vanity of vanities if you are disposed to investigate the matter you will find that the history of nations may be clearly traced in the visible moral expression of the homes of the people in the portable home tents of the arabs the homely solidity of the houses in germany and holland the cheerful wide spreading hospitality of switzerland the superficial elegance and extravagance of france the thoroughness and self assertion of the english and in the heterogeneous conglomerations of america made up of importations from every land and nation under the sun a constant striving and changing a mass of problems yet unsolved a friend once said to me while we were passing an incurably ugly house the man who built that must have had a very good excuse for it it was a profound remark but if that particular building were the only one needing apology for its ugliness or if there were no common faults of construction and interior arrangement i should not think you in special need of warning or counsel from me there are however so many ill looking and badly contrived houses so few really tasteful ones while year after year it costs more and more to provide the comfortable and convenient home which every man wants and needs for himself and family that i am sure you will be grateful for any help i may be able to give you we are told that all men women and children ought to be healthy handsome and happy i have strong convictions that every man should also have a home healthful happy and beautiful that it is a right a duty and therefore a possibility
