available in ebook and as print on demand via redshelf the criminal justice system in america does not work and from the perspective of current criminological thought no ideas exist for how to truly fix it the fault lies not with criminology as a discourse but with us as individuals we must together address three fundamental questions regarding our capacity and willingness to make a justice system of which we would be proud to pass off to our children specifically we must decide 1 whether or not we are permanently saddled with a hobbling justice system 2 if we are not inextricably bound to brokenness whether we are brave enough to strike out for the undiscovered country and 3 if we have the ability to embrace love despite the vulnerability it imposes specifically each of us must find within ourselves the capacity to bravely love without qualification ourselves each other and our world the purpose of this work is to discover what justice would look like were it predicated on love sacred sources including christianity islam buddhism and hinduism along with the thought of scholars like erich fromm karl marx simone weil and paolo freire are examined in detail for insights into the nature of love space is devoted to an attempt to understand why american justice practice is so broken despite the noble work of so many the last two chapters offer both a criminology of love and a sketch of a criminal justice system predicated on love the fifth edition of this introductory criminal justice text the contents have been pared down to five parts and sixteen chapters to best explain the intricacies of criminal justice policy and practice the book has been thoroughly updated by patrick anderson to cover developments in policing corrections the war on drugs and to include introductory cases on field practice the criminal justice system in practice the ideological framework of crime control and discussions of criminological theory and crime punishment
