in twelve essays influential scholars in political science explore the meaning of political leadership from the kaleidoscopic perspectives of the leaders institutions goals procedures problems and traditions involved the approaches as varied as the subject itself coalesce around the central question of how leaders interact with transform or are controlled by the organizations they lead recent literature has focused on identifying factors that facilitate or impede implementation of innovation in organizations attitudes toward change and transformational leadership are widely regarded as important determinants of implementation success but little research has empirically validated the existence of these relationships this thesis tested a multilevel model that places staff attitudes toward change as a mediator in the relationship between transformational leadership and implementation success further the model explores the largely overlooked role of leaders own attitudes toward a specific change being implemented in their work groups the ability of transformational leaders to influence their followers is often considered a strength during organizational change however if these leaders do not agree with an organizational change being implemented in their work groups they may be able to influence their followers toward not supporting the change thus the model tested whether leaders attitudes toward change moderate the relationship between transformational leadership and the attitudes of followers and subsequently affect the success of implementation the data for this study were from a large scale data collection investigating the role of implementation climate and leadership in the success of evidence based practice implementation participants were 310 mental health service providers and their supervisors working in organizations in the state of california data were collected via both web surveys and paper and pencil surveys multilevel modeling was used to simultaneously estimate the hypothesized multilevel moderated mediation model with transformational leadership and leaders attitudes toward change treated as level 2 variables to account for the nested data structure results indicated support for the path between transformational leadership and employees attitudes toward change as well as the path between employees attitudes toward change and implementation success however the direct effect of transformational leadership on implementation success was not supported the hypothesized moderating role of leaders attitudes toward change on the relationship between transformational leadership and the followers attitudes toward change was also not supported three exploratory models were developed and tested to assess the nature of the mediated relationship as well as to examine the possible presence of a direct path between leaders attitudes toward change and implementation success subsequent model comparison revealed support for an indirect relationship between transformational leadership and implementation success through employees attitudes toward change and also provided some support for the presence of a direct effect of supervisors attitudes toward change on employees attitudes toward change overall this thesis contributes to the literature on leadership and implementation by demonstrating the influence of transformational leadership and leader s attitudes towards change on both subordinates attitudes towards change and implementation success practical implications are discussed specifically with regard to the behaviors and initiatives that organizations may adopt to have more success with implementation efforts limitations and future directions for research are also discussed volume 5 of the southern illinois uni versity biennial symposium on leader ship research is concerned with the main issue of a rapidly developing field action versus research what should be studied and how it should be studied the contributors to this volume examine these issues and set them against a back ground of future research directions
