this may be the least known most important short document of the westminster assembly a book was circulated in london arguing that god is the author even of sin purportedly for the benefit of saints taking comfort in this in their trials the westminster assembly requested the english civil parliament to suppress this blasphemous book the parliament ordered the burning of the book and that the westminster assembly draw up a declaration in order to declare to the people the abominableness of it the declaration unanimously approved by the assembly with none dissenting very helpfully and carefully condemns the sentiments of the book that go to far as many today do and precisely defines how god orders sin for good while not being the efficient cause of it it coming solely from the creature at god's effective permission in this short piece see how the civil government and the church ought to cooperate between their distinct jurisdictions unto godly purposes and how censorship of that which is immoral it violating god's law is good and necessary
