offspring of alcoholic parents have been identified as at risk for maladjustment across many domains of psychosocial functioning including the development of alcohol and drug problems however it is critical to acknowledge that not all children of alcoholics coas are maladjusted a theoretically and empirically based understanding of the relationship between parental alcoholism and behavioral and psychological problems is necessary for the identification of children at greatest risk and for the development of appropriate intervention approaches the present study investigated how family disruption in childhood including parental divorce instability and aggression and violence between family members may contribute to the development of alcohol or drug involvement among adolescent coas offspring conduct problems and level of familial support were examined as potential mediating or moderating factors subjects who were selected from an ongoing longitudinal study included 50 substance abusing and 50 nonabusing adolescents with at least one alcoholic biological parent adolescent and parent pairs completed a battery of psychosocial interviews and questionnaires at intake and at follow up time points of 6 months 1 2 and 4 years analyses included the cross sectional comparison of abusers and nonabusers and longitudinal evaluation of initially nonabusing teens the families in this study reported much higher rates of violence including both interparental and parent to child aggression than those which have been reported in the general population childhood family instability was related to offspring conduct problems and lessened familial support in adolescence however neither family instability nor family aggression and violence during childhood were related to subsequent substance involvement contrary to expectations male adolescents from intact families demonstrated greater risk for substance involvement and abuse than those who experienced parental divorce during childhood discrepancies between the present results and previous evidence may be due in part to the present focus on the impact of family disruption on offspring functioning over time rather than concurrently future study of the impact of family disruption on coas should include consideration of alcohol specific behaviors such as modeling as well as changes in the family environment over time
