dr schindler critiques the clinical medical model of community psychology within its objectified client patient conversely the clinician operates with reified theories delimiting himself to the role of master psychologist engaged in a disturbed mode of communication with the slave other the clinician master is the enforcer of capitalist society's code which socialises people into a slave mentality unable to engage his client in an authentic dialogue the psychologist is unable to let the historical story of his client unfold phenomenologically as would be the case with the appropriate and intentional integration of theory and practice this same master clinical relationship to his client can be an analogue for the capitalist owner in his relationship to the worker citizen dr schindler then innovates practical techniques for therapeutic intervention into the concrete individual and institutional problems of american society not even past highlights references to nineteenth century u s slavery and anti black racism in literary and photographic projects begun during the late 1920s and early 1930s including novels by william faulkner and nella larsen and portraits by carl van vechten these texts share a representational crisis in which distinctions between present quotidian racism and a massive fully racialized historical trauma disappear all identify persistent historical traumatization with intense subjective states including madness religious ecstasy narcissism and fetishistic enjoyment and each explores the conservative even coercive social character of such links between psyche and history when the past of enslavement is not even past narration freezes black and white women lose their capacity to question or resist social and domestic violence and racial politics fail anticipating contemporary trauma studies by decades these disparate modernists works constitute not an expounded or avowed but an interstitial trauma theory which finds its shape in the spaces left by conventional public discourse their works parallel important essays by psychoanalytic thinkers of the same era including joan riviere sigmund freud melanie klein and walter benjamin and their joint explication of relationships among psyche history and race offers important resources for psychoanalytic approaches to racial difference today despite their analytic acuity however faulkner larsen and van vechten also themselves carry the traumatic past forward into the future indeed the two novelists tragic depictions of a triumphant color line and the photographer's insistence on an idiom of black primitivism lent support to white supremacy in the twentieth century yet even in their very failure three u s modernists tell us that it is not enough simply to exercise critical acuity on the marks of past violence reading however masterly cannot interrupt a history in the midst of repeating itself it can only itself reiterate the disaster
