Moral philosophers have traditionally addressed the educated public of their societies on the central questions of morality: what good lives are and what people can do in their particular circumstances to achieve them. John Kekes follows this tradition in both his choice of subject and his intended audience. Kekes discusses the nature and justification of moral traditions and he argues that there are two general conditions required for all good lives: first, good lives depend on trying to realize personal ideals; second, good lives also depend on the development of certain character traits, namely the virtues. In the final chapters, Kekes discusses how these ideals and virtues can form a coherent pattern and how this pattern can be rationally justified from publisher's description.
