in papua new guinea gender relations between men and women have long been described by anthropologists under the rubric of sexual antagonism and as being on the extreme end of the scale of male dominance in this paper i argue that in the least two societies the baruya and the sambia male dominance is so extreme that men and women can be said to occupy different socioeconomic classes in the conventional marxian sense of the term i begin by critiquing two anthropological dogmas egalitarian social formations and the complementarity of sex roles that make difficult the critical scrutiny of male dominance and practical work aimed at ending it next i present ethnographic data from the baruya and sambia focusing on the productive means relations and forces the analysis of which clearly demonstrates the existence of a gender class system my analysis thus challenges the gender blindness of conventional marxian thinking on the women question i then discuss the methodological and ethical flaws of non feminist fieldwork and conclude by making a plea for an explicitly feminist anthropology and feminist research program in papua new guinea and elsewhere
