emotion plays a significant role in our reasoning even without awareness perhaps especially for individuals who have a high affect intolerance i e difficulties tolerating strong negative emotions for such individuals the ability and opportunity to reflect on emotion may help clarify when emotions should influence reasoning two studies were conducted in an attempt to clarify the nature of the relationships between reasoning emotions and affect intolerance the first examined the effect of affect intolerance on performance on an emotional reasoning task participants were asked to determine whether conclusions logically follow from both emotional and neutral conditional if then statements emotion had a small effect on performance on the reasoning task however affect intolerance did not moderate the relationship the second study questioned whether reflecting on one's emotional responses affects performance on the same reasoning task participants who were asked to reflect on their emotions performed more poorly on the reasoning task than participants asked to reflect on cognitive aspects of the task affect intolerance moderated this effect such that people who were more tolerant of their emotions performed better in the cognitive reflection condition than in the emotional reflection condition but individuals who were less tolerant of their emotions performed the same in both conditions overall these studies support previous findings that emotion can negatively impact performance on reasoning tasks but suggest a more complex relationship for affect intolerance
