government can only function with the co operation or at least the compliance of the population compliance may be secured by the threat or use of force but excessive repression can erode a regime s authority lead to economic stagnation and provoke rebellion and possibly the imposition of international sanctions eventually a repressive regime may forfeit the support of its power base and the loyalty of the army police and civil service it will then no longer have the means to enforce compliance civil resistance employs strikes boycotts civil disobedience and so forth to undermine the opponents authority and sources of power it may have the revolutionary aim of overthrowing a regime or the more limited objective of securing reform it has been used to overthrow colonial rule and repressive regimes and to resist occupation and military coups it has been used too in parliamentary democracies in struggles for civil rights opposing preparations for nuclear war and other goals civil resistance took on a new dimension with the coming of industrialisation in the 19th century today due to the communicationst revolution the expansion of further education and the integration of the global economy its potential has again increased exponentially as the people power successes of the 1980s and 1990s have demonstrated it could play a crucial role in establishing and consolidating democratic societies and defending them against internal and external threats it could also figure in preparations for national defence as a substitute for or complement to military preparations
