what does it mean to be somewhere to what extent and in which specific ways is the way we experience the land historically and therefore culturally specific in landscape and experience in medieval anatolia nicolas trepanier explores how travellers urban elites and peasants related to the rural territory of medieval anatolia revealing how the same land could generate profoundly different experiences in a time of transition from byzantine to muslim rule through its use of landscape phenomenology the book offers historians not only an alternative to the spatial turn that concentrates on historical subjectivities but also an epistemologically grounded way to integrate fieldwork into their research it also proposes a new perspective on the phenomenological approaches that have polarized landscape archaeology over the recent decades more than anything else however this book shows readers of any background how history can provide fresh perspectives on our own modern experiences of the land

the dialects spoken in trabzon on the eastern black sea coast are the anatolian dialects that have preserved the most archaic features at the same time they are the ones that display the greatest number of innovations due to the influence of other languages in the region the archaisms indicate that the first speakers of turkish must have settled in the area more than a hundred years before the ottoman conquest i e in the 14th century although historical sources give no information on turkish settlements at that time the main aim of this study is to analyze the trabzon dialects synchronically and diachronically and to explain the features that distinguish them from other anatolian dialects the study also makes a hypothesis about the turkization of the area the second volume contains dialect texts which constitute the material for the analyses in the first volume these texts which have been recorded and transcribed by the author are provided with numerous foot notes and give a unique impression of the folkloristic and historical richness of the region dispossession and forced migration in the middle east remain even today significant elements of contemporary life in the region dawn chatty s book traces the history of those who as a reconstructed middle east emerged at the beginning of the twentieth century found themselves cut off from their homelands refugees in a new world with borders created out of the ashes of war and the fall of the ottoman empire as an anthropologist the author is particularly sensitive to individual experience and how these experiences have impacted on society as a whole from the political social and environmental perspectives through personal stories and interviews within different communities she shows how some minorities such as the armenian and circassian communities have succeeded in integrating and creating new identities whereas others such as the palestinians and the kurds have been left homeless within impermanent landscapes
