companies in the united kingdom and the united states are often credited with having the world's best corporate governance systems but the two countries have starkly different views on separating the roles of chairman and chief executive about 95 percent of the UK's largest publicly traded companies split the roles while 80 percent of big public companies in the United States don't combining them empowers a chief executive to act decisively but a nonexecutive chairman is in a better position to monitor the company's and the CEO's performance while there are strengths to both models separating the roles creates a stronger governance model and keeps executives more accountable to shareholders to encourage the separated model US companies may need to remarket the job of chairman by making it a respected career path as in the United Kingdom at a time when trust in corporate America is low reinforcing the independence of corporate boards by separating the positions of chairman and CEO could help rebuild it this paper is the result of over twelve months of research primarily based on direct interviews with experienced chairmen and chairwomen evidence shows that when damaging crises hit companies this is frequently due to directors risk blindness as a result of failure by boards of directors to have governed risks appropriately our hypothesis was that the influence of these two key roles chairman and ceo and especially the relationship between them would be a significant factor in how effective boards would be in avoiding risk blindness and successfully governing strategic risk as our work progressed we learned much about the chair ceo relationship including how that relationship needs to be built how it can be destroyed and the impact on boards when that occurs we discovered that risk especially strategic risk the degree of trust between the chair and ceo and time related issues were all closely interwoven we also learned of the natural lifecycle in this critical relationship that in its development and ending can damage board effectiveness and which poses a paradox for board chairs in fulfilling their critical role
