this thesis examines article xix of the general agreement on tariffs and trade the safeguard provision which allows states that experience an unexpected disruption or downturn in a domestic industry caused by increased imports resulting from gatt trade concessions to temporarily suspend on a non discriminatory basis the gatt obligations that caused the disruption alan o sykes based on his application of public choice theory to the behaviour of the signatory states has argued that the safeguard provision is a necessary component of the gatt since without it states would have lacked the incentives to enter into the gatt and the present agreement would unravel by contrast i analyze rationales for the safeguard regime from a two level game perspective incorporating international as well as domestic incentives i conclude that states will comply with a more restrictive safeguard regime than that advocated by sykes and propose reforms to the current regime accordingly
