autobiographical notes of a scientist is a collection of anecdotes and reflections from the author's life largely shaped by his journey as a scientist. It begins with tales of uncommon perception raising thought-provoking questions: can human perception transcend the limits of knowability and uncover information otherwise hidden from us? Can the future be predicted accurately with or without the aid of tools or clues? And what does this mean for the existence of free will or determinism in our lives? The author explores these questions through rational arguments and concludes that humans do not possess free will in their course of existence on this planet this finding he suggests offers a new way of interpreting human behaviour towards one another and carries significant implications for the judiciary and justice systems in society the book also presents a strictly scientific explanation of how reiki may work and concludes with a discussion on what is needed to establish a new solid state chemistry of phase transitions and material behaviour through the lens of electronegativity and where in this pursuit the author believes he missed the mark
