we use a new panel dataset of credit card accounts to analyze how consumers responded to the 2001 federal income tax rebates we estimate the monthly response of credit card payments spending and debt exploiting the unique randomized timing of the rebate disbursement we find that on average consumers initially saved some of the rebate by increasing their credit card payments and thereby paying down debt but soon afterwards their spending increased counter to the canonical permanent income model spending rose most for consumers who were initially most likely to be liquidity constrained whereas debt declined most so saving rose most for unconstrained consumers more generally the results suggest that there can be important dynamics in consumers response to lumpy increases in income like tax rebates working in part through balance sheet liquidity mechanisms the jobs and growth tax relief and reconciliation act of 2003 has been described as textbook fiscal stimulus using household survey data on the self reported qualitative response to the tax cuts we estimate that the boost to aggregate personal consumption expenditures from the child credit rebate and the reduction in withholdings raised the average level of real gdp in the second half of 2003 by 0.2 percent and by 0.3 percent in the first half of 2004 we also show that households in the survey were well aware of their tax cuts and tended to spend equally out of the child credit rebate and the reduced withholdings a result that is contrary to the conventional wisdom
