schools are often the safest most stable and most consistent forces in the lives of many children exerting a positive even miraculous influence they are places where many children are most likely to develop healthy positive relationships with peers and adults however it has become increasingly clear that the opposite also holds true for a number of children including a high proportion of poor children of color some school policies can drive students out before they have obtained the skills and credentials to advance in their lives leading to devastating and permanent consequences particularly on youths without other safety nets or supports to draw on more and more often schools and prisons are being mentioned in the same sentence the language of both institutions becoming interchangeable this issue describes how school policies can have the effect if not the intent of setting youths on the prison track it also identifies programs and policies that can help schools maintain safety and order while simultaneously reaching out to those students most in need of structure education and guidance offering a balanced perspective this issue begins to point the way toward less punitive more effective hopeful directions this is the 99th volume of the quarterly journal new directions for youth development development new york city underwent significant changes during this discourse enacting new disciplinary policies in public schools and opening spofford juvenile detention center now regarded as one of the greatest failures of juvenile justice in american history though education has long been considered a fundamental avenue to lift individuals from poverty its absence has also been weaponized by schools as a disciplinary technique in what has become known as the school to prison pipeline schools have used the denial of education through in and out of school suspensions and expulsions to reprimand students for inappropriate behaviors by examining the role of education in new york city s school to prison pipeline and youth detention centers using spofford as a case study it is clear that education has a powerful role in rehabilitating youth offenders though there have been many obstacles in its implementation this historical review asserts that from 1960 2000 the school to prison pipeline in new york city systematically denied children especially black and latino youth quality education by criminalizing their behavior removing them from school environments and placing them at higher risk of incarceration this punitive cycle not only undermined their educational development but also perpetuated a cycle of poverty and criminality by stripping them of tools necessary for academic and social mobility by exploring this topic the impact of education on new york city s at risk and incarcerated children particularly on a disproportionately minority population can be assessed to identify ways classrooms in both public schools and detention centers must be amended furthermore these conclusions challenge the notion that bad kids deserve to be denied education as punishment a central theme in the school to prison pipeline evident in the modern american classroom provided by author
