policymakers engaged in the pursuit of sustainable and inclusive development. The integration of the SDGs provides a timely and relevant framework for future development efforts. IV Advanced FAQs 1 How does the endogenous growth theory challenge traditional neoclassical growth models in explaining development disparities? Endogenous growth theory emphasizes the role of technological innovation and human capital accumulation as drivers of longterm growth unlike neoclassical models which often assume exogenous technological progress. This shift highlights the importance of investment in RD and education in promoting sustained development. 2 What are the limitations of using GDP per capita as the sole indicator of development progress? GDP per capita fails to capture crucial aspects of human wellbeing such as inequality, health outcomes, environmental sustainability and social inclusion, making it an inadequate measure of holistic development. The Human Development Index (HDI) provides a more comprehensive alternative. 3 How can the resource curse be mitigated to promote sustainable development in resourcerich countries? The resource curse can be mitigated through transparent governance, diversification of the economy, investment in human capital and the establishment of strong institutions to manage resource revenues effectively. 4 What are the key challenges in achieving the SDGs and how can international cooperation contribute to their realization? Challenges include funding gaps, lack of political will, technological limitations and the complexities of coordinating global efforts. International cooperation through knowledge sharing, financial assistance and collaborative initiatives is crucial in addressing these challenges. 5 How can behavioral economics contribute to a better understanding of development interventions and their effectiveness? Behavioral economics emphasizes the importance of psychological factors in shaping economic decisions. By understanding cognitive biases and social norms, policymakers can design more effective development interventions that account for individual behaviors and promote behavioral change. this book brings together perspectives of development economics and law to tackle the relationship between competition law enforcement and economic development it addresses the question of whether and how competition law enforcement helps to promote economic growth and development this question is highly pertinent for developing countries largely because many developing countries have only adopted competition law in recent years about thirty jurisdictions had in place a competition law in the early 1980s and there are now more than 130 competition law regimes across the world of which many are developing countries the book proposes a customized approach to competition law enforcement for developing countries set against the background of the academic and policy debate concerning convergence of competition law the implicit premise of convergence is that there may exist one or a few correct approaches to competition law enforcement which in most cases emanate from developed jurisdictions that are applicable to all this book rejects this assumption and argues that developing countries ought to tailor competition law enforcement to their own economic and political circumstances in particular it suggests how competition law enforcement can better incorporate development concerns without causing undue dilution of its traditional focus on protecting consumer welfare it proposes ways in which approaches to competition law enforcement need to be adjusted to reflect the special economic characteristics of developing country economies and the more limited enforcement capacity of developing country competition authorities finally it also addresses the long running debate concerning the desirability and viability of industrial policy for developing countries the author would like to acknowledge the research grants council of hong kong for its generous support the work in this book was fully supported by a grant from the research grants council of hong kong project no hku 742412h the 1920s marked the end of a century of mass migration from europe to the new world this paper examines analytically this pre quota experience the discussion is divided into two parts the first deals with the character and dimensions of overseas emigration from europe chiefly from the mid 19th century to world war i the second discusses the effects of these migrations on both sending and receiving countries the traditional literature has far more to say about the first than the second here we deal with the evolution of global labor markets first as they were directly influenced by the migrations and second as they interacted with the evolution of world commodity and capital markets the paper argues that the impressive economic convergence which took place between 1870 and world war i can be largely explained by these forces of economic integration rather than by technological convergence or differential human capital growth
