since 1968 hungary has attempted to combine central planning of the economy with a significant decentralization of economic decision making at the enterprise level in pursuing this objective hungarian authorities have increased their reliance on indirect controls and market forces while preserving a number of bureaucratic structures characteristic of the more traditional socialist economies and maintaining a strong commitment to equity in income distribution the country s policymakers now confront the complex task of developing a technologically advanced socialist economy that is capable of adapting rapidly to changing world conditions which it cannot control within the constraints imposed the economic management system that has been chosen and the country s history geography and resource endowments this paper describes the current decision making structures above the enterprise level looks at the role of planning in the hungarian system and examines some of the economic regulators used the paper discusses three dilemmas facing policymakers i speed vs participation ii equity vs efficiency and iii short term stabilization vs medium term structural transformation it concludes that these trade offs are interrelated and can be alleviated

this paper examines the role of the private sector and the potential for recovering costs in the public sector in the provision of education and health services in indonesia with particular attention to their budgetary and equity implications the study concludes that the option of encouraging a greater role for the private sector is feasible and desirable in both the education and health sectors using data from the 1978 national socioeconomic survey government subsidies per student are estimated for the different educational levels these are applied to the estimated numbers of public students to obtain the shares of government subsidies going to different household groups the concusion is that the present distribution of government subsidies in education is skewed toward the rich especially in urban areas because the rich are more likely to use the higher levels of service where the subsidies per student are greater a similar exercise is done for health an overall increase in user fees which incorporates a more progressive fee structure would have the effect of reducing the fiscal burden on the government while making for greater equity in the distribution of benefits
