in the world the two methods to monitor suppliers compliance that are examined in this thesis are assessment and collaboration results show that multinationals should not rely on either one of these two monitoring methods but should combine them using assessment only as first step and collaboration as second since assessment usually provides the buyer solely with a snapshot of the current situation at suppliers site collaboration as second step provides the relationship with a more mutual character frequent non compliance of parties the buyer and the supplier emphasise that collaboration and therefore mutual controlling processes are necessary in case the business relationship between buyer and supplier does involve operations in risky low regulated countries these findings are even more highlighted
