a longitudinal investigation was conducted to assess the existence nature and stability of neuropsychological np deficits in 50 unmedicated outpatient unipolar nonpsychotic depressives depressives were compared to 50 demographically comparable normal controls on 13 np variables depressives were tested prior to the start of antidepressant medication or placebo and were retested approximately four months later controls had comparable test retest intervals based on a review of the literature we hypothesized the following 1 at baseline depressed outpatients would perform worse than controls on tests of learning speed of information processing and perceptual motor speed but not on tests of retention of verbal and nonverbal information 2 among depressives increased severity of depression would be associated with increased impairment on np tests 3 at retest euthymic patients would improve on those abilities that were impaired at baseline beyond the level that can be attributed to practice effects and they would not perform differently than controls in any ability areas 4 improvement in mood would correlate with reversibility of np deficits baseline results indicated that depressives performed significantly worse than controls on np tests with a speed of information processing perceptual motor speed component groups did not differ significantly on tests of attention learning or retention increased depressive severity did not significantly correlate with np test results at retest no significant correlation between improved mood and reversibility of deficits was observed nonrecovered depressives exhibited mild deficits relative to controls on speed of information processing perceptual motor speed variables however recovered depressives did not differ significantly from either of the other groups nonrecovered depressives also differed from controls on these variables at baseline while recovered depressives did not differ from either group these findings suggested that in a group of ambulatory unmedicated nonpsychotic unipolars depression may be associated with stable mild deficits of speed of information processing perceptual motor speed in addition should unmedicated unipolar nonpsychotic outpatients exhibit learning attention or retention deficits or severe deficits of speed of information processing perceptual motor speed alternative explanations should be considered such as concurrent neurological illness substance use disorder medication effects or suboptimal effort on testing
