this inquiry was prompted by requests from broadcasters including bbc and itv for a review of the rules of broadcasting coverage of parliament the rules were framed from the start in a restrictive way on the basis that it would be easier to relax them than to introduce restrictions once broadcasting had become a part of the parliamentary landscape the committee s recommendations include simplification of the rules setting out guidelines on picture direction so that more is left to the judgment of the director in the control room split screen shots remain unnecessary and should remain forbidden but the existing rules on panning shots and zoom shots seem redundant and can be removed a small scale trial on a non sitting day using staff or the youth parliament with a camera mounted on the table of the house to allow more natural shots of front bench speakers with introduction into the house if the results are acceptable the proposals would make small practical changes to the way in which parliament is broadcast on television but which could make coverage a little more relaxed while retaining the central and essential principle that the broadcasts accurately portray proceedings fully and transparently for public information and the record
