google has become the main search engine for looking for information and chinese is the second largest population using the internet our research questions were to understand the accuracy and speed of identifying relevant information affected when native chinese speakers use a search system in english the systems were carefully designed all search engine result pages serps to match content in chinese and english subjects were asked to conduct six mock information tasks on assigned topics and to click the best result the target they could find on a serp the target could appear in six different locations and each task question was assigned with a suggested query subjects were asked to use assigned queries to perform searching first then they were allowed to use their own query only if they were not satisfied with the serp retrieved from the suggested query after the searching tasks all subjects were given a short english vocabulary test which we used to control for variability in english language proficiency we investigate the accuracy of item selection and the time used to complete the tasks the results show target location has a significant main effect on the accuracy of item selection with accuracy defined as clicking on the target when the target is high on a serp accuracy is greater results of 2 way interaction of english ability with system language shows that subjects did better on the chinese system compared to the english system and when english ability was higher subjects were much more likely to be accurate on the english system but higher english ability was associated with higher accuracy on english system only the significant of main effect of system language is dependent on measuring english ability without knowing either the system s language and english ability the main effect of system language is not significant english ability has a significant main effect on whether subjects chose to formulate their own queries the higher the subject s english ability the less likely they were to use their own queries there was significant main effect of system language for the time used on the first page displaying the task subjects took more time on the english system and english ability was not a significant factor english ability also had a significant main effect on the time used when subjects formulated their own queries the higher english ability the longer the time and system language was not a significant factor query type had a main significant effect on time spent on the serp retrieved by suggested queries subjects who chose to formulate their own queries spent more time and english ability target location and system language were not significant factors these results help us understand bilingual chinese searchers behavior when using a non native search engine searchers must rely on the rank of items on the serp when people have low english ability they are less likely to use a suggested query they spend less time on a serp before writing a new query
