the upper mississippian formations of western canada consist of thick carbonate sequences of predominantly crinoidal limestones dolomites and silty dolomites usually correlated on the basis of lithologic features and paleontology these carbonates originated through the combination of detrital biochemical and chemical processes they exhibit variations of texture and composition which analyzed by purely petrographic methods reveal rhythmical changes of the environment of deposition and provide means for correlation an ideal area for such an investigation should contain sedimentary rocks deposited in a shallow shelf environment particularly sensitive to fluctuations of sea level consequently an area was chosen in the front ranges of the rocky mountains of south central alberta where the rundle group of the upper mississippian was studied during the summers of 1956 and 1957
