the human predicament engages life's big questions: are our lives meaningless? is death bad? would immortality be better? alternatively, should we hasten our deaths by acts of suicide? many people are tempted to offer comforting optimistic answers to these existential questions; the text offers a less sanguine assessment and defends a substantial but not unmitigated pessimism.

please note this is a companion version, not the original book. sample book insights: 1 the human condition is a tragic one; life has no meaning from a cosmic perspective and our lives have no broader point or purpose; our quality of life is as poor as it is; death does not help us overcome our cosmic meaninglessness and it only makes things worse. 2 death is bad and while some have tried to cope by denying it, there is no avoiding it; the human predicament is that we are mortal and we must face this fact. 3 there is a distinction between optimism and pessimism in the realm of the facts: an optimist believes that a terrible fate will not befall him, whereas a pessimist believes that he will fall victim to that fate; they both agree that the fate is terrible but they have differing views about whether it will occur. 4 optimism and pessimism are both matters of degree rather than binary positions: if some feature of the human condition is negative, it can be more or less negative; if some other feature is positive, then similarly it can be more or less positive.

for each of us, if life is to be experienced as worthwhile, if not thrilling and occasionally pleasant, if not joyful, our diligence is required. even the most enviable of lives includes challenges, disappointments, frustrations, and confusions; there is a word for circumstances that challenge, disappoint, frustrate, and confuse: that word is predicament. being a human being is not easy; every advantage we enjoy seems to be accompanied by a disadvantage: we can acquire information but also experience the frustration of forgetting; we can create but also be tormented with writer's block; we can know the euphoria of being in love but also suffer heartbreak from a lover's rejection. these are but a few of the phenomena that can make life difficult, troubling, perplexing, and perhaps a predicament.
