campus fictions argues that the academic novel balances utopian and regressive tendencies reinforcing the crises we face in higher learning while simultaneously signposting hope for a worn institution whether a bestseller such as erich segal's romance love story 1970 or wonkier fare such as don delillo's white noise 1985 the academic novel mystifies the academy not only to a wide public but also worse to readers who might describe themselves as sympathetic to higher learning the book takes an eclectic approach to the academic novel with chapters discussing for example the genre's rampant anti intellectualism and its work refusals studying novels such as ishmael reed's japanese by spring 1993 and julie schumacher's dear committee members 2014 the book is also accompanied by the directory of the american campus novel file which tracks the genre by year by setting and by other datapoints that readers might make use of responding directly to jeffrey williams the renowned scholar of critical university studies who implores faculty to teach the university the book's conclusion describes strategies for putting these novels into circulation in the classroom through this breadth campus fictions establishes the importance of maintaining hope in the field of critical university studies which tends toward apocalypticism and perhaps therefore toward disengagement impostor a fiction draws on the traditions of the campus novel to paint a satirical portrait of academic life in a feuding department of english and creative writing the action is fuelled by a series of oppositions cultural intellectual personal embodied predominantly in the collegial rivalry between recently disgraced playwright william wisper a reluctant lecturer in creative writing and du mortier a prominent critic with an astringent line in post structuralism the supporting critical strand draws on my background in adult education and english literature to examine the contemporary creative writing landscape specifically in relation to its history pedagogy and disciplinary identity within the anglo american academy in particular i pursue two lines of enquiry the first examines the perception shared by many that creative writing courses are academically insular and indulge a culture of self the second takes this as a cue to examine the shifting relationship between creative writing and english and how this has manifested itself at a curricular and institutional level within the us and the uk i conclude with the observation that an increasing number of creative writing degrees are taking on hybridised fictocritical forms with important implications for the way in which creative writing pedagogy might evolve into the future
