The Department for Work and Pensions (DWP) and its agencies are responsible for administering around 40 social security benefits to the value of around 100 billion a year. Many of these benefits are linked together, hence some customers are in receipt of more than one benefit. The need for equity and fairness in interpreting legislation is a cause of complexity. Incentives e.g. to work and rewards e.g. for an individual's savings have been built into procedures. Problems are caused by the interface between DWP benefits and tax credits which are administered by HM Revenue and Customs and by the constant flow of major and minor legislative and administrative changes. Simplified procedures would enable both staff and customers to understand the system better and to avoid duplication of effort. There would also be less scope for benefits fraud, estimated at 2.6 billion in 2004/05. This NAO report also highlights the need for improved

each year the federal individual income tax delivers over 500 billion worth of incentives intended to encourage socially beneficial activities despite their efficiency rationale and substantial price tag relatively little attention has been paid to the question of what is the most efficient form for these tax incentives currently the vast majority operate through deductions or exclusions which link the size of the tax benefit to the taxpayer's marginal tax bracket this article argues that uniform refundable credits are a more efficient approach for tax incentives intended to correct for positive externalities absent evidence that externalities or elasticities associated with the subsidized activity vary by income class this conclusion holds even if no positive externalities are present moreover even when evidence of differences in externalities or elasticities does exist the most efficient subsidy is almost certainly still some type of refundable credit the efficiency benefits of refundable credits are further magnified by their tendency to automatically smooth household income and macroeconomic demand this article therefore proposes a dramatic change in how the government should provide tax incentives for socially valued activities the default for all such tax incentives should be a uniform refundable tax credit this article also considers the arguments of refundable credit opponents it concludes that concerns based on administrative and compliance costs are generally overstated in addition it finds that the vast majority of those who benefit from current law refundable credits have positive income tax liability over time refundable credits are thus frequently the rough justice equivalent of allowing carryovers and carrybacks which are common in other parts of the tax code the article therefore argues that the objection that tax incentives should not be structured as refundable credits because all americans should pay some income tax is not only conceptually problematic it is generally empirically unpersuasive on its own terms
